The formulation of the family as a system in the environment and of the individual as a subsystem in the family is one of the most dynamic and useful developments in mental health counseling. The family systems concept, although sometimes presented as a separate theory, is a natural fit with ecological concepts because both approaches are built on the notion of interrelationships. Ecological theory adds a key element to our study of the family system in that it reminds us to include in our understanding both the physical and the wider social environment; these are essential components in the quality of life pertaining to the basic unit of society—the family. The view of the family in the wider environment expands the concept of the social environment to include the family's ability to meet the members' physical needs, as well as the impact of such forces as natural disasters, government policy, and macro economics.

In classic free-market economics, economic activity aims to satisfy consumer demand. People are made happy—human welfare or well-being increases—when they get what they desire. Overall human happiness is increased, therefore, when the overall satisfaction of consumer demand increases. The law of supply and demand tells us that economies should, and healthy economies do, produce (supply) those goods and services that consumers most want (demand). Because scarcity and competition prevent everyone from getting all that they want, the goal of free-market economics is to optimally satisfy wants and thus maximize happiness. Free markets accomplish this goal most efficiently, according to defenders, by allowing individuals to decide for themselves what they most want and then bargain for these goods in a free and competitive marketplace.
